EARTHQUAKE NEWS

(Source: <http://blogs.nature.com>)

On April 11, 2012, two large earthquakes rocked the tectonically active region of Sumatra, Indonesia. Measuring M8.6 and M8.2, the quakes were centred approximately 400km off the west coast of Aceh and were generated by strike-slip movement along faults in the region. Estimates of slip along the 250-350km fault have ranged from 4 metres to over 15metres.

What is most unusual is that the large magnitude quake was generated by strike-slip faulting, a mechanism not normally associated with large quakes. It has been suggested that this is the largest magnitude quake ever produced via strike-slip faulting.

Due to the strike-slip nature of the faulting, no major tsunami was generated.
